This panel aims to critically explore the welcoming responses refugees, fleeing from the violent conflicts in their own countries, receive from the members of the host societies upon immigration to Europe, including Turkey. These responses are not solely determined by government policies regarding migration, border control and inclusion; yet they are always in dialogue with them. However, it is still possible to identify grassroots efforts to smoothen the transition of refugees and provide them with vital assistance and aid as well as tensions in local communities while receiving the refugees.

These local groups often advertise an ethics of care and hospitality, and act genuinely so. However, we argue against a mutually exclusive understanding of hospitality and hostility. This approach provides tools that allow us to situate the refugees and the locals at the same level, and reveal the workings of power, inequality, indebtedness and patronage as well as care and discipline in every encounter. All these intricate and intimate aspects of welcoming refugees have unforeseeably drastic effect on the questions of inclusion and exclusion, both in the present and in the future of host countries.

We particularly welcome submissions of papers based on ethnographic research and deal with the questions of hospitality/hostility, care and compassion in the context of the refugee influx with a critical eye.
